New York – SculptureCenter is pleased to present Denial is a River, a group exhibition that explores how syndromes translate into matter, allowing for a complex of social currents to become visible from the surface through eruptions, gurgles and patterns. This exhibition stems from the methods and tactics of the seven selected In Practice artists, placing their concerns into a larger field of artistic practice. (See below for more information on SculptureCenter’s In Practice program.) Denial is a River will be on view September 10 – November 18, 2006 with an opening reception on Sunday, September 10th 4-6pm.

Compiled through a convergence of interests, artists in Denial is a River reflect syndromes within a common cultural condition: syndromes that effect access to information and affect collective historical data. Appropriations from various sources, fragments from a shared political heritage, are surreptitiously modified, or juxtaposed, to create other narratives or discourses. Sometimes they confuse the issues, sometimes they expand, sometimes they isolate, sometimes they denounce. Denial is a River functions in the controversy between the systems of convention and codification, belief and communication.

Denial is a River incorporates a diverse set of media and disciplines from Jean-Luc Godard’s 1970 video Ici et Ailleurs to conceptual clothing design by Azra Akšamija. Matthew Lusk transforms SculptureCenter’s courtyard into a Boy Scout encampment rendered dysfunctional. Acconci Studio contributes Virtual Intelligence Mask (1993) in which the wearer’s view of the world is mediated through cameras placed on the crown of the mask. Melissa Dubbin and Aaron S. Davidson install CIA Reading Room for Kids (2006) decorated with elaborate wallpaper and toy-like butterflies that, upon a closer look, display former military encoding devices, and include a compilation of books for children recommended by the CIA. Wonjoo Park addresses convention and control by constructing two electric chairs, one from US letter sized paper and the other from A4 paper, the standard in Europe and Korea, the artist’s home country. Rita Ackermann exhibits her archives and diaries for the very first time, informing the viewer about the making of her infamous veiled women whose cultural backgrounds are overlaid with meaning.
